It's all too easy to think of ourselves as the dominant (and thereby) better species, but I think a book like this helps remind us that we aren't necessarily the most beautiful or best animal out there, but rather that we've been granted the gift unique of recognizing beauty in the world. From cats to cows to camels, a book like this helps us to recognise the beauty of our fellow animals and reveals artists' interests in such 'beasts' throughout the ages.

For all time, artists have maintained a close relationship with the animal world, which has proved to be an inexhaustible source of inspiration. First, they received inspiration directly from their environment. Then animals were used in art for their status as domestic friends, symbols of an intimate and familial life, as well as starting points for a fantastic imagination, particularly held in high-esteem during the Renaissance. Later in Orientalism, animal art followed the discovery of exotic fauna which appealed to contemporary artists. The animal and its wild beauty are comprehended here through works of art from Albrecht Dürer, Pieter Brueghel, Leonardo da Vinci, Eugène Delacroix, Henri Rousseau and Paul Klee.
